The first number of a new mayazine called The Three Spires " contains an article written by a clergyman and entitled "A Sunday aftersoon chat with Mr. Gladstone." The writer says that the chat occurred during the time when the Local Government Act was being considered in Parliament. Mr. Gladstone was asked by his interviewer what his opinion was as to the licensing clauses. He replied that the onnecieuce of the people was opposed to depriving the publicans of their means of living without any compensation. He imagined that the remaining houses would reap the benefit of the increased onatom by the diminution in the number of houses. He advocated heavylicensing fees, but was greatly in favour of the Swedish, system by which liquors are sold at cost price, thus depriving the publicans of their interest in the sale of drink.
